An assessment was carried out in advance of a proposed development at the site. The study area was thought to have been pasture or gardens until the mid 18th century when the first housing development occurred. Terraced housing with gardens at the rear was present by the 19th century and commercial properties were developed in the 20th century. Destruction caused by enemy action in the Second World War led to site clearance in the 1950s. The vacant land was built on in the 1970s and has remained. [Au(abr)]

An assessment was carried out to evaluate the potential for the survival of archaeological remains in advance of a residential development. This potential was thought to be low, however, due to the city's research priority in the development of housing in the 18th and 19th centuries, a watching brief was recommended. [Au(adp)]

An assessment was conducted in response to a residential development. The study showed that the site had been occupied from at least the beginning of the 19th century and lay in an area of medieval field division. The research also highlighted the site's proximity to a possible Roman cemetery. [Au(abr)]

An assessment was carried out at the site in advance of development. Research indicated that there had been a considerable clearance of buildings during the Civil War sieges of Bristol. Redevelopment continued into the 18th century and peaked in the 19th. There was the chance that garden features from this point may have survived, as well as the continuation of a Civil War defensive ditch. Deposits and structural features from the 19th century should have survived. [Au(adp)]

An assessment was carried out at the site in advance of the construction of a block of flats. The land was part of the Kings Barton in the medieval period and would have been pasture or scrub until enclosure in the late 18th century, followed by later development. The site formed part of the premises of a car hire firm. [Au(abr)]

An assessment was carried out at the site in advance of a new residential development. The site appeared to have been extensively developed from the 19th century onwards, although it was thought possible that it had been built on before this date. A possible Roman road was thought to run through the site, and the area was probably settled and cultivated in the medieval period. [Au(abr)]

An assessment was carried out in advance of a residential and commercial development. A previous evaluation had found evidence of 11th to 13th century deposits as well as post-medieval miners cottages. Documentary sources revealed more about the site and its origins. The potential for the recovery of archaeological remains from other periods remained untested. [Au(abr)]

The assessment was carried out in advance of a proposed residential development. The site was used for agricultural purposes until the construction of a Grade II Listed, 20th century garage premises. Documentary sources indicated that the site was originally developed and owned by the Bristol Tramways and Carriage Company Ltd. Recent work also suggested that the site of the Suger House House Pottery lies c.50m to the north of the study area. [Au(adp)]

An assessment was carried out in advance of a proposed residential development. Most of the site was thought to be of limited archaeological potential, however, the site of Bromwell House was of some interest due to the possibility that it stood on the site of an even older house. There were no other recorded archaeological sites in the area. [Au(abr)]
