Although most of the test pits were positioned outside the known areas of archaeological importance, 14 did fall within the Romano-British settlement at Wattle Syke. None of the test pits outside of the archaeological area revealed any features. Only two of the trenches excavated within the settlement produced evidence of possible archaeological features. Flints were recovered during the works that may indicate Mesolithic activity in the area. [Au(abr)]

An archaeological investigation undertaken during the excavation of engineering trial pits revealed that there had been extensive truncation and levelling in parts of the site. Some potential medieval deposits were noted, though the most tangible features were two large pits that may be related to the 18th century brick kiln that had existed to the west of the site.
