Albion Archaeology Bedford : Albion Archaeology, 2003, 43pp, colour pls, figs, tabs, refs

Work undertaken by: Albion Archaeology

An archaeological recording action was undertaken in advance of the erection of several dwellings. The earliest evidence for utilization of the area was a possible prehistoric pit identified during the evaluation. A small assemblage of Roman pottery was recovered from later features, evidence for medieval activity comprised the remains of ridge and furrow and a substantial ditch. The majority of archaeological features exposed were post-medieval or later in date. The western land parcel had been severely affected by Victorian disturbance. [Au(abr)]

Work undertaken by: Albion Archaeology

During the excavation of the road corridor, large quantities of later post-medieval and modern debris were revealed, including pottery and glass vessels, animal bone and a variety of ceramic building materials. Although the depth of ground disturbance associated with the access road was not great, traces of possible medieval walls and a small though significant medieval pottery assemblage had been recovered. Extensive trial and small scale excavations were carried out on the site. A number of shallow pits and ditches were identified dating to the 12th century, when tenements were probably established on the site. By the late 13th century, stone buildings had been built on the site. An oven base and stone drain were found in association with one of the buildings. A boundary ditch, latter replaced by a boundary wall, was also identified. By the 15th century the site had been abandoned and by the 19th century was in use as an orchard. [Au(abr)]
