Work undertaken by: Caroline Atkins

Very few finds were made during the period of archaeological supervision, other than fragments of assorted modern building materials, and only one item, a sherd from a bread puncheon, might have suggested activity on the investigated part of the site prior to the twentieth century. [Au(abr)]

Work undertaken by: Humber Field Archaeology

Monitoring of the site strip and excavation of the foundation trench systems revealed the location of a former garden pond. No archaeological features and no residual archaeological material was identified within the upper ground layers. The sequence of deposits revealed consisted of topsoil overlying sandy clay over bedrock. [Au(abr)]

The almost total absence of evidence for human activity on the site prior to the 20th century, and the character of the observed deposits, appeared to suggest that this part of the hillside had been stripped of its topsoil and then recoated with a substantial deposit of clean sand. [Au(adp)]

Work undertaken by: Pre-Construct Archaeology (Lincoln)Beneath the topsoil, a layer interpreted as made-ground was exposed, possibly associated with the late Victorian/early modern activities at the site. This sealed a series of alluvial deposits, formed by warping to improve the fertility of the land. Later post-medieval and early modern brick and tile was recovered from these layers. [Au(abr)]*SMR primary record number:*2463*Archaeological periods represented:* PM
