There was to the rear of 16 Bisham Village, a 17th century timber framed building which comprised a series of pit features. These pits included the results of quarrying and disposal of domestic refuse. In addition to this a chalk lined soakaway was visible, cut through the large quarry pit and filled with 19th century material. The soakaway remained in use as could be seen by the number of modern services culminating in a modern brick-built addition. Two sherds of 15th century pottery were recovered from made ground deposits. [Au(abr)]

The observations demonstrated that previous terracing of the site had removed all traces of the natural terrain. Due to the level of earlier landscaping any man-made features would have been removed during that work. [Au(abr)]

A large pit cut into the subsoil and backfilled with modern demolition material constituted the only cultural material remains on the site and the archaeological potential of the site and its immediate environs were thus deemed to be very low. [Au(abr)]
