The assessment established that the site was on the margins of the main area of medieval activity of the town, and was likely to have been used as gardens. This was assumed to have been the function until the late 19th century, when a series of outhouses associated with the inn were constructed. There was thought to be high potential for the survival of medieval remains, protected by a thick layer of garden soil, although finds may be sparse. [Au(abr)]

Despite a lack of evidence from early maps showing activity before the 19th century, limited activity was found in the form of a 16th century fire beacon and two 18th century gun batteries. There was a possibility of early remains at some depth, however the works carried out in this development would only impact upon the 19th century made ground. [Au(adp)]
