The evaluation confirmed the presence of seven ring-ditches which had previously been identified through a documentary search and geophysical survey. The ring-ditches were ploughed-out Bronze Age barrows, and in one instance a central burial was recovered. More have been identified in the geophysical survey. Linear features, thought to represent prehistoric land divisions, were also evident. Finds were limited in quantity, but did include an articulated sheep or goat skeleton. Development was thought to impact upon six of the seven ring ditches. [Au(adp)]

Currie, C K : CKC Archaeology, 2002, 77pp, colour pls, figs, tabs, refs

Work undertaken by: CKC Archaeology

The work revealed that street front development may have come at a relatively late date in the development of medieval Salisbury. The earliest building on the site was of flint and chalk, and may have been a dovecote. A number of pits and hearths were excavated, although their purpose was unknown. This was followed by a period of construction of elaborate, well made stone buildings and some industrial activity. There was a demolition phase in the early post-medieval period. Further rebuilding occurred in the 18th century, and the site was given over to the Anchor brewery in the 19th century. [Au(adp)]

The site lay within an area that contained a series of irregular earthworks. A shallow, bowl-shaped depression was found cut into the natural geology. This was filled with burnt material, and probably represented the remains of a man-made hollow to seat a fire or hearth.
