The remains of a late Roman building complex were identified, comprising limestone walls and internal and external surfaces. The building most likely fronted onto the Fosse Way, a bus thoroughfare, and probably went out of use in the late 4th century AD. Deposits of dark earth indicated medieval activity, while the post-medieval period was represented by a well and rubble filled pit. [Au(abr)]

Work involving the recording of the standing remains of the house, as well as excavation, was carried out. Two main phases of construction were identified; a small yet grand hunting lodge of the 16th/17th centuries, followed by development into a country mansion in c.1730. Various modifications were carried out in the 19th century. The remains of the house were regarded to be vulnerable, and any new building on the site or in the vicinity was thought to affect these remains. Appropriate archaeological recording in advance of any new development was recommended. [Au(adp)]
